A GOLDEN TRUTH .- The Boston Transcript, a dear old paper that. we regret to say, we receive never often er than semi-occasionally, frequently comes out with some agricultural information that fills us with joy, and makes us wish to sell out our brownstone fronts and miscellaneous tenement-houses, and move right out in the country, for the purpose of settling down and becoming the brother of the golden-rod and the good-natured mule. The Transcript, in a little article entitled "Bees in Orchards," remarks:

"It is said a larger crop of apples is raised when a hive of bees is stationed in the orchard.'

Correct, Benvolio, correct thou art, thou onseemly caitiff. And the crop of apples would be larger still if the bees were vellow-jackets, with sabres sufficiently long and sharp to sting the small boy through the hat or boots. Bees are very good to make ets are better still, and a Siberian bloodhound beats even the vellowjackets. Because the bloodhound is work without provocation, and tist makes the apple crop large and the small boy crop small,

The same paper gives a long-winded account of a French method of
